The role of pyridoxine on the effects of multiple drug exposure. The purpose of this study was to evaluate the role of the protein synthesis and methionine metabolism in the toxic effects of multiple drugs on the cardiomyopathy induced by ethanol and to assess the role of pyridoxine supplementation of a diet containing ethanol and water. Male Wistar rats were treated with ethanol (20% v/v, 7 days) with or without vitamins A and E, 2-mercaptoethanol (2ME), acetaldehyde, and N-acetylcysteine (NAC). The cardiomyopathy was evaluated by using echocardiography, histopathology, and measurement of oxygen consumption (VO₂). All the compounds tested increased the cardiomyopathy induced by ethanol. The cardiomyopathy induced by NAC and ethanol was reduced by vitamins A and E and by 2ME. Conversely, the cardiomyopathy induced by NAC and ethanol was not reduced by acetaldehyde. Pyridoxine supplementation of the diet containing ethanol and water lowered the cardiomyopathy and the alterations in the methionine metabolism induced by ethanol. Pyridoxine supplementation was the most efficient in reducing the alterations in the cardiomyopathy induced by ethanol.

Supplementation with pyridoxine or vitamins A and E was less efficient to prevent the cardiomyopathy induced by ethanol and multiple drugs. Isoelectric point of aquaporin-1 in non-capillary body fluids. It is unclear whether aquaporins (AQPs) in non-capillary body fluids (NCBFs) maintain appropriate isoelectric points. We therefore investigated the significance of the electrostatic potential in the blood and cerebrospinal fluid (CSF). The whole blood density (ρ) and deionized water density ($\rho = 1.007$) were determined by a g

Utility of serial DOCTOR-PATHOLOGIST correlation in the diagnosis of papillary thyroid carcinoma. Accurate diagnosis of papillary thyroid carcinoma (PTC) is essential for the clinical management of patients. The main role of this diagnosis is to distinguish malignant from benign or follicular neoplasms. To date, there are no universally accepted criteria to precisely differentiate between the follicular variant of PTC and the follicular adenoma. Objective of the study is to assess the utility of routine histopathological correlation by a single pathologist with the final diagnosis reached by the surgeon, in order to aid the surgical management of this pathology. We selected 500 thyroidectomy specimens submitted between 1 January 2004 and 31 December 2006 for surgical resection. Histopathological correlation was obtained by a single pathologist from all cases which reached a definite diagnosis: 172 benign lesions, 72 follicular adenomas, 13 follicular thyroid carcinomas (FTC), 94 papillary thyroid carcinomas (PTC) and 17 follicular variants of PTC. Correlation between the final diagnosis reached by the pathologist and the surgical findings was concordant in 98.3% of PTC. This figure rose to 97.7% when only cases showing the classical PTC phenotype were included. In contrast, only 50% of the follicular adenomas were concordant. In conclusion, routine histopathological correlation of thyroidectomies by a single pathologist is useful to accurately distinguish between benign and malignant nodules. However, when follicular adenomas are encountered histopathological examination does not allow accurate differential diagnosis with follicular variant of PTC. Therefore, malignant nodules should be subjected to formal histopathological examination by multiple pathologists.
